Building upon the ethnographic material and literature dating from the early 1970s until the 2010s, this thesis is about the production and transformation of dissident sexual geographies through the interplay of sexual politics and citizenship in Beyoğlu and Aksaray, two districts of Istanbul, Turkey. In particular, the interdisciplinary inquiry is composed into the form of a walk on Istiklal Street in Beyoğlu district, historically a central place for cruising activities, finding dissident sexual communities and organising political events among LGBT circles. Throughout, the study focuses on the generational use of three interconnected areas: places, such as gay and transgender bars and clubs (1970s-2010s); politics, such as gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) sexual identity politics (1980s-2010s), and virtualities, such as cyberspaces produced through internet and webcam technologies (1990s-2010s).

Alp Biricik is a researcher at Tema Genus, the Department of Thematic Studies – Gender Studies, Linköping University, Sweden. This is his doctoral thesis.
Building upon the ethnographic material and literature dating from the early 1970s until the 2010s, this thesis is about the production and transformation of dissident sexual geographies through the interplay of sexual politics and citizenship in Beyoğlu and Aksaray, two districts of Istanbul, Turkey. In particular, the interdisciplinary inquiry is composed into the form of a walk on İstiklal Street in Beyoğlu district, historically a central place for cruising activities, finding dissident sexual communities and organising political events among LGBT circles. Throughout, the study focuses on the generational use of three interconnected areas: places, such as gay and transgender bars and clubs (1970s-2010s); politics, such as gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) sexual identity politics (1980s-2010s), and virtualities, such as cyberspaces produced through internet and webcam technologies (1990s-2010s).

Alp Biricik is a researcher at Tema Genus, the Department of Thematic Studies – Gender Studies, Linköping University, Sweden. This is his doctoral thesis.